INTO the Arabian desert comes Major Jack Allen on a lion hunt. The king of beasts is so bold that if hungry enough he will attack a camel train. For that reason Allen is apprehensive when forced to camp in a place he knows to be a favorite hunting ground of lions. During the night a baby camel is born. In the excitement the camp is left without adequate guard, but the mother camel's intuition scents the danger and she gives the alarm. Allen is just in time to frighten the beast away with his express rifle. The next morning, following the tracks of the lion, the major prepares for the hunt, taking plenty of ropes along with him.

When his lair is found the major sits down in front of it while Ali Dene goes back and brings the camel, laden with a string net of hemp rope baited with sheep meat. It is cleverly hidden in the sand and when the lion is induced to come out he is hopelessly entangled in the net. It is then an easy matter to secure him and bind him for transportation to the coast.
